TIME EDITORIAL

whatever price it takes to buy the research outcomes they need to defend themselves.

In a recent article in the June 9, 2005 edition of the highly regarded scientific journal Nature, entitled "Scientists behaving badly", the ethics and behavior of researchers were studied through a survey of over 3,200 scientists, and the authors came to alarming, but far from unique conclusions. According to the study's authors:

"Serious misbehaviour in research is important for many reasons, not least because it damages the reputation of, and undermines public support for, science... We surveyed several thousand early- and mid-career scientists, who are based in the United States and funded by the National Institutes of Health (NIH), and asked them to report their own behaviours. Our findings reveal a range of questionable practices that are striking in their breadth and prevalence."¹

The article above appeared on the same day that The New York Times reported, in a story "Drug Safety System Is Broken, a Top F.D.A. Official Says" that, "...the nation's drug safety system had 'pretty much broken down' and that there was room for 'a lot of improvement' in the government's approach to uncovering dangers in drugs already on the market."¹

ICA concluded its response to TIME stating that it "holds that all citizens deserve better than the dogmatic, heavy handed, economically driven and scientifically questionable approach which Mr. Jaroff seems to think is good public health policy. Ask anyone whose child has been harmed, and whose lives have been ruined by the connection between vaccination and autism and other mentally and physically debilitating conditions."
